Nature and the seasons are central to pagan worldviews and are celebrated through rituals and festivals, such as Yule, Beltane and Samhain.

Those with pagan worldviews often hold the belief of 'living in circle' with all of nature.

Those with pagan worldviews might apply the concept of 'personhood' beyond humans, such as to rivers and forests, and give these similar rights to humans.

Those with pagan worldviews often have sacred sites, usually at places of natural and historical significance, where they may perform ceremonies and rituals and leave amulets and charms for good luck and protection.

The Rollright Stones are a local site important for many people with pagan worldviews and these stand on a Neolithic site of significance.

Those with pagan worldviews often see life as a circle and death as a necessary part of life, just as it is in the rest of nature.

Those with pagan worldviews might describe themselves as religious or non-religious. They might hold a range of beliefs about the spiritual world or the supernatural.
